

Want this grade?

Are you scheduling soon?

Choose classes to benefit you.

Students have said that smaller class sizes...

- Academically help them gain higher grades in their smaller classes
- Improve the behavior of the class
- Provide positive interactions with their professors

Statistics have said that smaller class sizes...

- Improve problem- solving skills
- Help with critical thinking
- Increase long- term retention
- Promote student discussion and information sharing

I chose to make a flyer for my student audience because I feel that it will attract students more. Teenagers lack the patience to sit there and read something unless it really interests them, and my topic of classrooms may be the last thing to catch their attention. I organized my flyer in what I felt was the easiest to read and understand. I used the grade in the top corner to look like an exam and maybe to help with the attention getter. I then tried to consistently use the color red to make it seem even. I put only the most important information on it in order to make it visible from further away and readable from passing students. I also tried to use the CRAP principals to the best of my ability. I accomplished this by using the color red to focus attention to certain parts and underlining the difference in the two categories. I also used bullets to align my work and used my image as an alteration on the flyer and make it stand out and look different.

My first flyer example gave me the idea of not putting too much on one page. It was large and clear to follow along with, as well as used great color and font choice. Along with that, as soon as I looked at it I understood its purpose and what the message was. My second example had excellent use of space. Although a lot of information was stated on the flyer, it was all organized perfectly that made it easy to follow. You understood what part of the page to look at to find certain information. My last example had good use of color. It was completely covered all over and got my attention right away. This is what influenced me to use the red that pops on the white paper.